HIGHLIGHTS

- Rapid growth in the demand for safety, enforcement and investigative services has created a shortage of qualified personnel in this field – translating to less competition, greater opportunities for advancement, and higher salaries
- Get more personal attention in small classes with dedicated and experienced faculty
- Two four-week field placements provide real-world employment experience
- Surveys of recent Loyalist graduates show full employment including attractive starting salaries, particularly for those willing to relocate
- A common first-year curriculum gives students the flexibility to change specialties and enter Year Two of Community and Justice Services, Police Foundations, or Customs Border Services

CAREER OPPORTUNITIES

- This unique program prepares graduates for private and public law enforcement opportunities as investigators, enforcement officers, special constables, fraud investigators/analysts and emergency planners
- Graduates have found varied employment as military police officers, transit and university special constables, nuclear security officers, municipal enforcement, Alcohol and Gaming Commission inspectors, as well as many areas of private security and investigations
- Graduates are also eligible to apply for careers with police services and RCMP. Many careers in enforcement and policing require applicants to pass a qualifying examination, which may include physical fitness testing, psychological testing and a written examination, as well as a police background check
